Not all problems or disagreements are equal. The size of our reaction should match the size of the problem. So let's practice putting some problems into their right size.

MAJOR PROBLEMS are ones that are big and possibly unsafe or dangerous. You could've tried to solve this problem before and might need an adult to help.

MEDIOCRE PROBLEMS will affect your day if you don't do something about it.

MINOR PROBLEMS are able to be handled, solved on your own. The problem won't ruin your day.

Cut out these scenarios and decide which 'size' they belong in then glue them in the appropriate place.

You've lent your friend your school summer hat, and they haven't returned it to you.	You've found yourself in trouble for something that you didn't do.	Someone pushes in front of you in line.
You race out to the sports gear to get a basketball, but someone else gets the ball at the same time as you.	You have to wait for your turn on the iPad only the person before you isn't getting off.	Somebody has spread a mean rumour about you that isn't true.
Someone accidentally knocks into you, making you drop your lunch on the ground.	You shared your new felt pens with the classmates in your group, some have been returned with lids missing.	Your lunch is missing from your bag, again. You think you know who it is but the teacher won't believe you.
You forgot to do your homework and your friend won't let you copy theirs.	While playing a game of tag you get 'tagged' so hard that it hurts.	A good friend of your's at school decides they want to play with someone else today.
You're working out a maths problem and the rest of the group has a different answer than you. You're sure you are right.	Your best friend has shared a secret that you told them, and now everyone in your class knows.	After school you're with a friend who dares you too graffiti on the walls of your school library.

You've let a friend use your sun hat and they haven't given it back.	You're in trouble for something you didn't do.	Someone pushes in front of you in line.
There aren't enough basketballs for everyone.	It's your turn on the iPad but the person before you won't get off.	Someone is saying something mean about you to other people in the class.
Someone accidentally knocks into you, making you drop your lunch on the ground.	You shared your new felt pens and now some are missing their lids.	Your lunch is missing from your bag, again.
You forgot to practice your spelling words.	While playing a game of tag you get 'tagged' so hard that it hurts.	A good school friend decides they want to play with someone else today.
The people sitting at your table are being noisy and you can't concentrate on your work.	Your best friend has shared a secret that you told them, and now everyone in your class knows.	After school you're with a friend who dares you to make a mess with the toilet paper in the school toilets.
